Jay Ducote
Food enthusiast, blogger, TV star, radio show host

By Veronica Mosgrove

It's not uncommon to find some of the best tailgate food prepared in Baton Rouge, Louisiana by cooks from around the state. Jay Ducote never dreamed of becoming a chef.

In fact, he just enjoyed cooking for people particularly on game day in the confines of Louisiana State University (LSU) and the world famous Death Valley. It's the cooking he did on the grounds of the University that ultimately landed him on a number of reality cooking shows, most notably Food Network Star.

"A year ago, I was filming Food Network Star in Los Angeles," said Ducote. The show aired between June and August of 2015.

After graduating from LSU with degrees in economics and political science, Ducote taught math and coached high school baseball before becoming a researcher and grant writer at the Department of Health and Hospitals.

Not a fan of sitting at a computer all day long, Ducote started writing about food. "I was literally writing about what I had for lunch that day," said Ducote.

The year was 2009 and social media was not only becoming more popular, but changing how people got information. Ducote's blog started to take off.

But as his hobby of writing about food grew, Ducote's cooking skills remained consistent with what he was passionate about.

"The extent of my cooking was what I learned to cook at LSU tailgates which included barbecue, jambalaya, gumbo and red beans and rice – anything that could be cooked in big iron pots."

Ducote's Bite & Booze blog was such a hit that in April 2011, he was offered a radio show which airs on Saturday at 5:00 p.m. and Sunday at 7:00 p.m. on WDGL Talk 107.3 FM. He's even won several broadcasting awards for his radio show dedicated entirely to highlighting and promoting the local food and beverage scene. Over the years, the blog and radio broadcast have evolved into an exploration of food culture.

"I've found something I am truly passionate about and now I research it. I learn everything I can about food so I can tell stories about the people, our culture and the history of cuisine."

One thing Ducote does not want to be called is a food critic.

"I'm a food enthusiast, not a critic. I want to celebrate our local food scene, our local chefs and most importantly, our local food producers."

Before being a contestant on Food Network Star, Ducote launched

Jay D's Louisiana Barbecue Sauce which is made in Louisiana and sweetened with Louisiana cane syrup.

"Using Louisiana ingredients is important to me," said Ducote. "Other Louisiana influences include cayenne pepper for a little kick."

Since launching his barbecue sauce, Ducote has also collaborated with Louisiana's Landry Vineyard to create Jay D's Blanc Du Bois. You can also find his Louisiana Molasses Mustard, which is also sweetened with Louisiana cane syrup, on store shelves.

"Jeff Landry is very proud of the grape that's grown here in Louisiana and heavily promotes it," Ducote said.

Ducote's Blanc Du Bois came out last Memorial Day. The next collaboration will be in stores this Memorial Day. His products can be found in stores in Baton Rouge, Lafayette, New Orleans, Monroe and the Northshore area. He also has a barbecue dry rub coming out soon.

Beef, forage field day set for April 26 in Homer

(03/10/16) HOMER, La. – The LSU AgCenter Hill Farm Research Station will host a Northwest Beef and Forage Day on April 26.

Registration will begin at 8:30 a.m., and the program will start at 9.

Stan Bevers, of Texas A&M AgriLife, will talk about today's beef market outlook and what's next for cattle producers.

"The volatility of the market is on the minds of all producers," said AgCenter beef project leader Ryon Walker. "Prices were up a year ago then back down this past fall, so everyone is hoping to get some insight into what's next."

AgCenter researchers and extension agents will conduct field tours beginning at 9:45 a.m.

Topics that will be covered include: horn fly control and resistance in cattle by Lane Foil, controlling crabgrass in hay fields by Wink Alison, management of grazing forages by Ron Strahan and Lee Faulk, and new clover varieties by Buddy Pitman.

Jimmy Walker, of Hillsboro, Texas, will conduct a stock dog demonstration.

"Cattlemen are looking for a low-stress way to handle their herd," Ryon

Walker said. "We're going to have a field demonstration on how Border Collies are a great way to do that."

James Hendrix, AgCenter coordinator with the Louisiana Master Farmer Program, will speak during lunch.

The field day is free. Interested people are encouraged to register by calling the Hill Farm Research Station at 318-927-2578 or emailing Laura Haley at lhaley@agcenter.lsu.edu.

The Hill Farm Research Station is located at 11959 Highway 9 in Homer, Louisiana.

AgCenter mosquito control efforts aim to minimize effects of Zika virus

By Bruce Schultz
LSU AgCenter

(03/02/16) BATON ROUGE, La. – An LSU AgCenter medical entomologist is working with mosquito control efforts in Louisiana to minimize the effects of tropical diseases such as the Zika virus.

Kristen Healy said that Zika virus will probably be less of a threat in Louisiana than other mosquito-borne diseases in the area, including West Nile virus or eastern equine encephalitis.

Healy, who primarily focuses her research on mosquitoes and mosquito-borne pathogens, said West Nile virus and eastern equine encephalitis rely on birds for transmission. “These diseases are more difficult to control because you cannot easily access local bird populations,” she said.

With Zika virus an animal reservoir is not required in the transmission cycle, she said, so transmission can be reduced by having people protect themselves from mosquito bites.

Healy said protective measures that can be taken include:

- Use of repellents registered with the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and applying them according to label instructions.
- Wearing long sleeve shirts and long pants that are light-colored.
- Checking yards and businesses weekly for standing water in containers such as tires and buckets where mosquitoes lay eggs.
- Repair of window and door screens to prevent entry of mosquitoes into homes.
- Support for local mosquito control programs.

So far, Healy said, Zika has been detected in individuals in the U.S. who have traveled abroad, including a handful in Louisiana.

“Since it is still early in the mosquito season, it would be unlikely to see any local transmission at this time. However, there is still much we do not know about which mosquito species will be important for transmission in this area,” Healy said.

The symptoms of Zika include a mild flu-like illness, she said, with fever, joint pain, conjunctivitis and a skin rash that alerts health care workers to the possibility of the disease, in addition to recent travel abroad.

“The greatest risk at this time is by traveling to countries where local transmission is occurring,” Healy said. “It is not unusual to expect imported cases coming into the U.S., but an imported case in the area does not mean that local transmission will occur.”

Only 20 percent of the people exposed to the disease will show any symptoms, she said.

“The main concern at this time is the current link between infants born with microcephaly to mothers infected with Zika virus during pregnancy. However, there is still much we do not know regarding this link,” she said.

Currently, the Centers for Disease Control (CDC) is recommending that women who are pregnant or might become pregnant avoid travel to areas of known Zika transmission. More information about travel warnings and restrictions can be found at <http://www.cdc.gov/zika/index.html>.

Protection from mosquito bites is not only important because of the potential threat of Zika, but also because of existing disease-causing pathogens spread by mosquitoes in Louisiana, Healy said.

“West Nile virus continues to be important in our area, as well as sporadic cases of eastern equine encephalitis, Saint Louis encephalitis and La Crosse encephalitis,” Healy said.

Also, mosquitoes are the sole means of transmitting heartworms to pets, she said.

Two species of mosquitos, the Asian tiger (Aedes albopictus) and the yellow fever mosquito (Aedes aegypti), have been identified as potential vectors of pathogen transmission. Healy said graduate students in her lab are working to find out more about the behaviors of these two species to help fight disease spread.

The Asian tiger mosquito is highly abundant in this area, especially during the summer months, she said, while the yellow fever mosquito has a much smaller distribution in the state.

“Unfortunately, both Aedes albopictus and Aedes aegypti will bite during the day as well at dusk, dawn and evening hours,” Healy said.

Healy has three researchers in her lab who are studying different aspects of mosquitoes.

Research associate Emily Boothe is working in six parishes to study the mosquito responsible for transmitting West Nile virus. This includes evaluating collection techniques for trapping adult mosquitoes and monitoring of insecticide resistance in the state. Also, her research interests extend to the Asian tiger mosquitoes, and her work will determine how temperature affects larval development, metabolism and larvicide efficacy.

Graduate student Nick Delisi is evaluating susceptibility of mosquito larvae to different larvicides that target these immature mosquitoes. He is currently in the process of comparing field-collected mosquitoes to an established lab colony strain with no resistance.

Graduate student Shiloh Judd is studying the feeding habits of the Asian tiger mosquito that feeds on plant nectar as well as blood. All mosquitoes feed on plant nectars as a source of energy. By determining which species of plants are most attractive to mosquitoes, there is potential to target these plants as another avenue for control of mosquitoes.

Healy and her lab work closely with mosquito control programs around the state and are implementing several applied research projects.

Todd Walker, director of the East Baton Rouge Parish Mosquito Abatement and Rodent Control, said his office works closely with Healy and the LSU AgCenter.

“They do tests to evaluate the effectiveness of our applications and pesticides,” Walker said.

Walker said Healy obtained a grant from the EPA to study the potential effects of using pesticides against mosquitoes on honeybees. The results of the study have been favorable, he said. “Properly done, mosquito control operations do not have to be harmful to honeybees.”

Walker said efforts are being made with the LSU AgCenter to design a drone, or unmanned aerial vehicle, to scout for potential mosquito breeding sites that would be difficult to access, such as a pile of discarded tires in a wooded area.

Walker said Healy assists the Louisiana Mosquito Control Association, and she serves on the board of directors.

Healy also is participating in the national Extension Disaster Education Network to compare different state responses to Zika. She said several parishes have developed their own campaigns to spread public awareness of how the disease can be prevented.

Cornell University in New York has developed an extensive website about the disease. It can be accessed at <http://eden.cce.cornell.edu/disease/Pages/Zika.aspx>.

Also, the University of Florida has information about the virus, mosquito vectors and prevention at <http://edis.ifas.ufl.edu/in1120>.

The LSU School of Veterinary Medicine has several mosquito research projects underway. Rebecca Christofferson, assistant professor in pathobiological sciences, with the Vector-borne Disease Laboratory at the school, is studying the virus to see how it presents itself in different forms.

Christofferson, working with veterinary science doctoral students Ania Kawiecki and Handly Mayton, said the team’s goal is to improve the ability to diagnose the virus.

Before he was a contestant on Food Network Star, Jay Ducote launched Jay D's Louisiana Barbecue Sauce which is made in Louisiana and sweetened with Louisiana cane syrup.

Ducote collaborated with Louisiana's Landry Vineyard to create Jay D's Blanc Du Bois.

While he says people are often surprised when they realize he is not a traditional or classically trained chef, his favorite thing to cook is still tailgating food.

“By the time Food Network Star came around, I got over the fact I was not classically trained. I felt like my skills were a lot closer to being where I should be, and I was more comfortable with doing food my way,” he said.

Ducote is honored to represent Louisiana on the national level and is focused on being another ambassador for the state, its culture and particularly its cuisine.

“I really respect what chefs like John Besh and John Folse have done to support sustainability and the local farmer. I don't necessarily want to replicate what they do, but rather blaze my own path.”

While Ducote does not have the desire to work in a restaurant, he said, “One of the powerful things about food is that it means something. When you cook for someone, it's a sign of caring and love. It's not just about nutrition.”
