Chef Celeste's Louisiana Treasures

By Veronica Mosgrove

As a little girl growing up in Detroit, Baton Rouge chef and 'Cooking Up Louisiana Treasures' cooking show host Celeste Gill loved to watch chefs Julia Child and Justin Wilson on television. To her, having a cooking career was something she only dreamt of.

"As a child, I would always imagine myself doing what I'm doing today so the fact that I'm on t-v cooking is amazing," said Gill.

But her cooking career did not come early in life. Initially, she served her country as a member of the Army National Guard and lived in several states as a result. Her final stop during her military career brought her to Baton Rouge. "We saved the best for last," said Gill.

While serving in the Guard, Gill went back to school and obtained her associates degree in food science. "You can go into food as a profession, but for some of us, it's a calling," added Gill.

That calling has propelled her into a career she truly loves.

A chance meeting with a local television producer at a charity event where Gill was cooking opened another door.

"I always talked about having a cooking show and I became a featured guest on the 'Around Town Show' where I did cooking segments." In the meantime, Gill was also doing cooking demonstrations on Saturday's at the local Farmer's Market where she featured what the farmers were selling that day and showed several different ways to prepare the crops. "The farmers love it. It has proven to be a success because when we feature certain crops, the farmer's tell us people will purchase what is featured."

As time progressed and Gill got positive feedback from her cooking segments on the local community program, she applied for a Specialty Crop Grant through the Louisiana Department of Agriculture and Forestry. That opened the door to help her produce the cooking show, "Cooking Up Louisiana Treasures!"

"I'm like a kid in a candy store. Why pigeon hole yourself? My hobbies happen to be my work so it's not like going to work to me."

The format of the show includes trips to a farm to highlight a Louisiana farmer and a particular crop, a trip to the Farmer's Market to pick up other Louisiana grown products to cook for the meal, cooking segment and a discussion on health benefits and other facts about the crop with agricultural experts.

"In Louisiana, when it comes to food, we recognize new ideas and we support each other. Here, we wake up and think about what's for lunch and dinner." She added, "You may have your home gardener or farmer, but I want to reach out to the generation that does not cook anymore. It's important to educate the public on how easy it is to cook your own food, how affordable it is and where your food comes from."

Gill said the cooking show has a distinct purpose. "If we're doing this right, you'll start visiting your local Farmer's Market, roadside stand, take a trip to a local farm or go wherever you can to buy local products." She added, "It's so much better to have something that's been picked that day or the day before than something that's been trucked across America."

Gill says the show has taught her a lot about the products she features such as a crop's growing season and its health benefits.

"I'm not money driven. I just love what I do. I'm also a self-starter. Everything you do is not going to be a huge success. Failure is part of succeeding. You just have to learn how to manage your failures. I tell my daughter, Taylor, that all the time. It's about self-confidence, finding your passion and committing to it." Gill says she has an open mind and does not fear business or working hard. She says she learned a long time ago that if something doesn't work, try

Louisiana Agriculture & Forestry Today

Chefs Taste Challenge coming to NOLA in Aug.

The first-ever Farm to Table Chefs Taste Challenge is scheduled for Friday, August 7 at the Farm to Table Conference at the New Orleans Ernest N. Morial Convention Center.

Ten chefs from all over the country will compete. Here's the catch, they will highlight produce from various geographical regions.

It's no secret, Louisiana has some of the best cuisine. However, the goal of the Chefs Taste Challenge is to get a fresh take on a food competition aimed at broadening awareness for the use of fresh, healthy, sustainable ingredients in preparing food. The event will provide a platform to feature 10 chefs from around the country.

What's even more exciting is that the chefs from around the country will compete to create the best dish that utilizes farm-fresh items from ingredients donated by state departments of agriculture from across the country.

While the term "farm to table" indicates local products, this competition will showcase what people are eating around the country. Attendees will experience New Jersey tomatoes to cherries from the Pacific Northwest.

Judges will include a panel of industry leaders in the culinary world. The top two winning chefs will receive awards and there will also be a "fan favorite" voted on by the audience.

The 10 competing chefs include: Chef Craig Baker of Indianapolis, In.; Chef Frank Brigtsen of New Orleans, La.; Chef Rocky Durham of Santa Fe, New Mexico; Chef Matthew Farmer of New Orleans, La.; Chef Joshua Galliano of Clayton, Mo.; Chef Richard Jones of Nashville, Tn., Chef Joel Navejas of Fort Collins, Co.; Chef Hari Pulapaka of DeLand, Fl.; Chef Carmen Rodriguez of Lake Arrowhead, Ca. and Chef Elise Wiggins of Denver, Co.

For more information about the event, go to <http://chefstastechallenge.com>. It's going to be a fabulous time!

Figs remain a popular Louisiana fruit

Rick Bogren
LSU AgCenter

June is time for figs in Louisiana, and many of the popular varieties around the state have come from a breeding program at the LSU AgCenter.

It started back in the mid-1950s, said LSU AgCenter horticulturist and fruit plant breeder Charlie Johnson. That's when Ed O'Rourke joined the LSU Department of Horticulture as a fruit breeder.

The most popular fig variety grown in Louisiana is Celeste, which has been around for more than 100 years, Johnson said. Elsewhere in the Southeast, Brown Turkey enjoys greater popularity.

Because fig trees are easily propagated, the Celeste variety can be found almost anywhere in Louisiana. Figs can be propagated by cuttings, he said. "You can take a twig and stick it in the ground, and it will root and become a tree."

Fig is a good pass-along plant, Johnson said. "The same variety may have as many as 25 'names,' because someone got a cutting from someone else, who got that from someone else. And many times they come with the name of the person who provided the cutting."

Homeowners can propagate their fig trees by burying a low branch in the soil or by air layering – making a slit in a branch, wrapping it with damp sphagnum moss or even newspaper, and covering it with plastic wrap to hold in the moisture. In either case, roots should develop within a couple of weeks, Johnson said. Then the cutting can be transplanted into the soil or a pot.

Those methods, along with simply sticking a twig into soil, are the easiest ways for sharing a tree with a friend or neighbor.

"Figs are fun to grow and collect," Johnson said. "You can grow them in 5-gallon or 10-gallon pots and put many different varieties in a backyard."

Even with so many backyard plants being shared throughout Louisiana, the AgCenter revived O'Rourke's research in 1990 and began releasing new varieties. "Since then, we've released LSU Purple, LSU Gold, Tiger, Champagne and O'Rourke, which we named after Ed," Johnson said.

The releases were collected from O'Rourke's original crosses that were developed over a 10-year period from the mid-1950s until the mid-1960s. O'Rourke used a variety called caprifig from California as the male parent and the varieties Celeste from Louisiana and Hunt from Georgia as the female parents.

When the fig breeding program was interrupted in the mid-1960s, O'Rourke had hundreds of trees planted in several locations in Louisiana. Those AgCenter trees, however, survived.

"They were planted at the AgCenter Hammond Research Station, on the Baton Rouge campus and at other research stations," Johnson said.

In the 1990s, Johnson and AgCenter fruit specialist Jimmy Boudreaux worked with O'Rourke to identify the various plants that had come from O'Rourke's earlier research.

"We collected and identified individual plants from Ed's original work," Johnson said. "We compared them in several locations and assured they were truly AgCenter varieties."

After the trees were collected and identified, the researchers began evaluating what they had before they could release them to the public. They looked at fruit size, cold-hardiness and disease resistance among other attributes.

"To truly evaluate figs, you need trees of the same age in the same soil," Johnson said. "So we compared our trees with other known varieties over a five-year evaluation before we considered them for release."

The AgCenter released the varieties LSU Purple in 1991 and LSU Gold in 1995. Then in 2007 it released three more varieties – Tiger, Champagne and O'Rourke.

Tiger fruit is 30 to 50 percent larger than Celeste, Johnson said. It matures seven days

earlier and has a longer fruiting period on a relatively small tree. "It's good for the backyard."

Champagne is yellow with good cold resistance, Johnson said. A brown streak shows when the fruit is ripe. "Birds seem to be able to see the yellow figs better, so they're more of a problem," he said.

O'Rourke is much the same as Celeste but with larger fruit and more productivity. "We call it an 'improved Celeste,'" Johnson said.

The AgCenter has additional fig varieties being evaluated for release.

One variety, L55-2-66, is a black fig that ripens later than others – about the third week of July, Johnson said. It's black with a strawberry-red pulp.

Historically, AgCenter fig varieties have been released as public varieties – they have no plant patent protection and are available for any nursery or individual to propagate and sell.

Taking care of fig trees is relatively easy, which makes them popular in home landscapes.

Maintaining the trees is straightforward, Johnson said. Unlike many other fruit trees, figs make new fruit on new growth that comes in spring, so winter pruning doesn't cause problems.

"Pruning is almost a necessity to keep fig trees in bounds," Johnson said. "It's better to keep space under the tree open for air circulation and to keep the center clear for sunlight."

The height should be "about as high as you can reach with a pruning shear – about 8 1/2 feet," he said.

Figs can be grown totally organic, Johnson added. "In fact, few pesticides are labeled for figs."

Fig leaf rust is the primary disease affecting the trees. Under the right conditions, it appears in June and is full-blown by July after the fruits mature. The disease doesn't appear to hurt the trees, however. Leaves fall and new leaves appear almost immediately.

The spores live on diseased leaves on the ground and are blown by wind up into the new leaves, which then are infected, turn brown and fall off. "This cycle of defoliation and regrowth can happen three to four times in a wet summer," Johnson said.

New fig varieties tolerate rust better and hold their leaves longer, he said.

Trees with rust resistance, however, present a drawback. Without defoliation, trees stay green longer into the fall and are more susceptible to winter cold damage.

"Trees with rust lose leaves earlier in fall and harden off more quickly," Johnson said. "This makes them more cold tolerant."

something else.

Gill has other projects in the works including a cooking segment with Miss USA and other contestants that will air during the Miss USA pageant held in Baton Rouge in July. She is also working on a non-profit, Chef Celeste Culinary Institute, for at-risk adults to help train them to work in the culinary industry. "Food can take you anywhere in life. I truly believe that." She is also working on a project with Louisiana Public Broadcasting – one she hopes can go national. "If you want it and you think about it, your actions will take you there. If you dream it, you can have it."

Since 2006, Gill has served as food service director at Baton Rouge retirement community Southside Gardens where she writes the menu's, handles staffing, orders food and supplies.

Gill also has a small store called Louisiana Treasures which is located at the Baton Rouge Main Street Market. While she features some of her own products such as her honey mustard made with local honey, her spicy garlic, garlic Italian seasoning and balsamic honey mustard, she also features items from other vendors. Gill's daughter, Taylor, helps manage the shop.

Some of her products are sold in multiple grocery stores around the Baton Rouge area.

"Cooking Up Louisiana Treasures!" airs in Louisiana and Mississippi. The cooking show is available on Youtube, CookingUpLouisianaTreasures.com, ChefCeleste.com, www.ldaf.la.gov, and on television. Check your local listings. If viewed online, you can participate in a survey to let Gill know how she's doing.

Louisiana Agriculture & Forestry Today

Chefs Taste Challenge coming to NOLA in Aug.

The first-ever Farm to Table Chefs Taste Challenge is scheduled for Friday, August 7 at the Farm to Table Conference at the New Orleans Ernest N. Morial Convention Center.

Ten chefs from all over the country will compete. Here's the catch, they will highlight produce from various geographical regions.

It's no secret, Louisiana has some of the best cuisine. However, the goal of the Chefs Taste Challenge is to get a fresh take on a food competition aimed at broadening awareness for the use of fresh, healthy, sustainable ingredients in preparing food. The event will provide a platform to feature 10 chefs from around the country.

What's even more exciting is that the chefs from around the country will compete to create the best dish that utilizes farm-fresh items from ingredients donated by state departments of agriculture from across the country.

While the term "farm to table" indicates local products, this competition will showcase what people are eating around the country. Attendees will experience New Jersey tomatoes to cherries from the Pacific Northwest.

Judges will include a panel of industry leaders in the culinary world. The top two winning chefs will receive awards and there will also be a "fan favorite" voted on by the audience.

The 10 competing chefs include: Chef Craig Baker of Indianapolis, In.; Chef Frank Brigtsen of New Orleans, La.; Chef Rocky Durham of Santa Fe, New Mexico; Chef Matthew Farmer of New Orleans, La.; Chef Joshua Galliano of Clayton, Mo.; Chef Richard Jones of Nashville, Tn.; Chef Joel Navejas of Fort Collins, Co.; Chef Hari Pulapaka of DeLand, Fl.; Chef Carmen Rodriguez of Lake Arrowhead, Ca. and Chef Elise Wiggins of Denver, Co.

For more information about the event, go to <http://chefstastechallenge.com>. It's going to be a fabulous time!

Figs remain a popular Louisiana fruit

Rick Bogren
LSU AgCenter

June is time for figs in Louisiana, and many of the popular varieties around the state have come from a breeding program at the LSU AgCenter.

It started back in the mid-1950s, said LSU AgCenter horticulturist and fruit plant breeder Charlie Johnson. That's when Ed O'Rourke joined the LSU Department of Horticulture as a fruit breeder.

The most popular fig variety grown in Louisiana is Celeste, which has been around for more than 100 years, Johnson said. Elsewhere in the Southeast, Brown Turkey enjoys greater popularity.

Because fig trees are easily propagated, the Celeste variety can be found almost anywhere in Louisiana. Figs can be propagated by cuttings, he said. "You can take a twig and stick it in the ground, and it will root and become a tree."

Fig is a good pass-along plant, Johnson said. "The same variety may have as many as 25 'names,' because someone got a cutting from someone else, who got that from someone else. And many times they come with the name of the person who provided the cutting."

Homeowners can propagate their fig trees by burying a low branch in the soil or by air layering – making a slit in a branch, wrapping it with damp sphagnum moss or even newspaper, and covering it with plastic wrap to hold in the moisture. In either case, roots should develop within a couple of weeks, Johnson said. Then the cutting can be transplanted into the soil or a pot.

Those methods, along with simply sticking a twig into soil, are the easiest ways for sharing a tree with a friend or neighbor.

"Figs are fun to grow and collect," Johnson said. "You can grow them in 5-gallon or 10-gallon pots and put many different varieties in a backyard."

Even with so many backyard plants being shared throughout Louisiana, the AgCenter revived O'Rourke's research in 1990 and began releasing new varieties. "Since then, we've released LSU Purple, LSU Gold, Tiger, Champagne and O'Rourke, which we named after Ed," Johnson said.

The releases were collected from O'Rourke's original crosses that were developed over a 10-year period from the mid-1950s until the mid-1960s. O'Rourke used a variety called caprifig from California as the male parent and the varieties Celeste from Louisiana and Hunt from Georgia as the female parents.

When the fig breeding program was interrupted in the mid-1960s, O'Rourke had hundreds of trees planted in several locations in Louisiana. Those AgCenter trees, however, survived.

"They were planted at the AgCenter Hammond Research Station, on the Baton Rouge campus and at other research stations," Johnson said.

In the 1990s, Johnson and AgCenter fruit specialist Jimmy Boudreaux worked with O'Rourke to identify the various plants that had come from O'Rourke's earlier research.

"We collected and identified individual plants from Ed's original work," Johnson said. "We compared them in several locations and assured they were truly AgCenter varieties."

After the trees were collected and identified, the researchers began evaluating what they had before they could release them to the public. They looked at fruit size, cold-hardiness and disease resistance among other attributes.

"To truly evaluate figs, you need trees of the same age in the same soil," Johnson said. "So we compared our trees with other known varieties over a five-year evaluation before we considered them for release."

The AgCenter released the varieties LSU Purple in 1991 and LSU Gold in 1995. Then in 2007 it released three more varieties – Tiger, Champagne and O'Rourke.

Tiger fruit is 30 to 50 percent larger than Celeste, Johnson said. It matures seven days

Courtesy LSU AgCenter

earlier and has a longer fruiting period on a relatively small tree. "It's good for the backyard."

Champagne is yellow with good cold resistance, Johnson said. A brown streak shows when the fruit is ripe. "Birds seem to be able to see the yellow figs better, so they're more of a problem," he said.

O'Rourke is much the same as Celeste but with larger fruit and more productivity. "We call it an 'improved Celeste,'" Johnson said.

The AgCenter has additional fig varieties being evaluated for release.

One variety, L55-2-66, is a black fig that ripens later than others – about the third week of July, Johnson said. It's black with a strawberry-red pulp.

Historically, AgCenter fig varieties have been released as public varieties – they have no plant patent protection and are available for any nursery or individual to propagate and sell.

Taking care of fig trees is relatively easy, which makes them popular in home landscapes.

Maintaining the trees is straightforward, Johnson said. Unlike many other fruit trees, figs make new fruit on new growth that comes in spring, so winter pruning doesn't cause problems.

"Pruning is almost a necessity to keep fig

trees in bounds," Johnson said. "It's better to keep space under the tree open for air circulation and to keep the center clear for sunlight."

The height should be "about as high as you can reach with a pruning shear – about 8 1/2 feet," he said.

Figs can be grown totally organic, Johnson added. "In fact, few pesticides are labeled for figs."

Fig leaf rust is the primary disease affecting the trees. Under the right conditions, it appears in June and is full-blown by July after the fruits mature. The disease doesn't appear to hurt the trees, however. Leaves fall and new leaves appear almost immediately.

The spores live on diseased leaves on the ground and are blown by wind up into the new leaves, which then are infected, turn brown and fall off. "This cycle of defoliation and regrowth can happen three to four times in a wet summer," Johnson said.

New fig varieties tolerate rust better and hold their leaves longer, he said.

Trees with rust resistance, however, present a drawback. Without defoliation, trees stay green longer into the fall and are more susceptible to winter cold damage.

"Trees with rust lose leaves earlier in fall and harden off more quickly," Johnson said. "This makes them more cold tolerant."

something else.

Gill has other projects in the works including a cooking segment with Miss USA and other contestants that will air during the Miss USA pageant held in Baton Rouge in July. She is also working on a non-profit, Chef Celeste Culinary Institute, for at-risk adults to help train them to work in the culinary industry. "Food can take you anywhere in life. I truly believe that." She is also working on a project with Louisiana Public Broadcasting – one she hopes can go national. "If you want it and you think about it, your actions will take you there. If you dream it, you can have it."

Since 2006, Gill has served as food service director at Baton Rouge retirement community Southside Gardens where she writes the menu's, handles staffing, orders food and supplies.

Gill also has a small store called Louisiana Treasures which is located at the Baton Rouge Main Street Market. While she features some of her own products such as her honey mustard made with local honey, her spicy garlic, garlic Italian seasoning and balsamic honey mustard, she also features items from other vendors. Gill's daughter, Taylor, helps manage the shop.

Some of her products are sold in multiple grocery stores around the Baton Rouge area.

"Cooking Up Louisiana Treasures!" airs in Louisiana and Mississippi. The cooking show is available on Youtube, CookingUpLouisianaTreasures.com, ChefCeleste.com, www.ldaf.la.gov, and on television. Check your local listings. If viewed online, you can participate in a survey to let Gill know how she's doing.
