Century Farm inductee Dwayne David fondly remembers his days on the family farm in Vermilion Parish. “It’s the core of the family. It’s how we grew up and where we began. It’s the essence of the farm family,” said David.

David’s family is one of 17 honored June 24, 2016, at the 94th annual Louisiana Farm Bureau Federation convention in New Orleans for owning and operating their farms for at least 100 years. The David farm was established in 1908 and has farmed rice, soybeans and crawfish for four generations.

“The original farm house my great grandfather built still sits on the property.”

The Century Farm program is sponsored by the Louisiana Department of Agriculture and Forestry, the LSU AgCenter, Louisiana Farm Bureau Federation and the Louisiana Land Bank.

“It’s an honor to recognize the land and families who have maintained the land and active operations for more than a century. It’s quite impressive,” said Dr. Rogers Leonard with the LSU AgCenter. “With so many challenges, it’s tough to keep something 100 years.”

“Other generations had a dream when they bought their land. They dreamed not only to benefit themselves but also future generations,” said Stephen Austin with Louisiana Land Bank.

For Department of Agriculture and Forestry Commissioner Mike Strain, D.V.M., reminisced about growing up on his family farm which he still owns.

“I’m sure you all know the song ‘The House That Raised Me’ well, I always go back to the farm that raised me. When I stand there, I feel the generations that built me. The day I graduated from vet school, I went back to the farm,” said Strain.

Strain is a sixth generation farmer. He choked up as he remembered those nightly phone calls from his late father whom he would discuss the farm. The crowd echoed his emotion as he spoke.

“These farms – they are who we are. When I need strength, I always go back to the farm,” said Strain.

Owner claims abandoned cattle, authorities continue to search for thieves

Baton Rouge, La. (June 28, 2016) – Investigators said a trailer load of cattle found along I-12 heading east near Hammond, La. Monday, June 20, 2016 were stolen from an Iberville Parish cattleman.

Authorities added the trailer carrying the cattle was also stolen property from another Iberville Parish farmer.

The 18 Brangus heifers were returned to their owner Wednesday, June 29. They were housed at Amite Stockyard as the Louisiana Department of Agriculture and Forestry (LDAF) Brand Commission and law enforcement looked for leads in this theft of livestock and farm crime.

"Because these cattle were not branded, it took us longer to identify who owned these heifers. We encourage all livestock owners to properly identify their animals with official ear tags or brands," said LDAF Commissioner Mike Strain, D.V.M.

"Farm equipment such as trailers must also be properly inventoried so identification can be made in theft cases."

Anyone with information is asked to call the LDAF hotline at 855-452-5323 or Iberville Parish Sheriff’s Office.

A reward up to $1,000 is being offered for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the person or persons responsible for this crime through the LDAF Livestock Crime Stoppers Program.

Commissioner

Diseases, insects featured at pecan growers meeting

Choosing the proper fungicide and alternating among those in different chemical groups are important considerations in managing diseases in pecan trees, experts told the audience at the Tri-State Pecan Growers Convention on June 17.

About 160 pecan producers and other industry representatives attended the convention, said Stephen Norman, president of the Louisiana Pecan Growers Association, which hosted the meeting.

The convention serves growers in Louisiana, Arkansas and Mississippi, Norman said.

“Several diseases have the potential to infect pecans,” said LSU AgCenter plant pathologist Randy Sanderlin.

Scab disease is the most common, Sanderlin said, followed by anthracnose, neosaccosiaecum, sooty mold as a result of honeydew from yellow aphids, and bacterial leaf scorch, which could be confused with the effects of pecan scorch mites.

“Even when there is no crop on the trees, growers should apply fungicides to protect leaves from pathogen infection at least through mid-June,” he said.

“After mid-June, the use of fungicides when there is no crop on the trees may not provide much value in the current year,” Sanderlin said. “However, the condition of the foliage this year will affect crop production for a least the next three years.”

It’s important to know the different fungicides, said Katherine Stevenson, a plant pathologist with the University of Georgia.

For scab disease in particular, alternating fungicides with different modes of action is important to avoid creating fungicide resistance in the pathogen, she said.

“Select the frequency and timing of applications, and know management options,” Stevenson said.

When it comes to controlling insects, having the proper pH in mix water is important to the success of insecticides, said AgCenter entomologist Dennis Ring.

Ring presented several examples of how the effective control of various insecticides is reduced by mixing them in water with the wrong pH.

"Water pH can be changed by adding a buffer, but “add buffers little by little to reach the optimum pH in the spray water,” he said.

The primary concern with insects is those that feed on nuts, and a secondary concern is those that feed on leaves. “We need leaves on trees as long as we can to bring these pests out and into December to make food for next year,” he said.

“Identify the problem and know how many insects are present, when to treat and the treatment required,” Ring said.

Pecan weevil is the most-damaging late-season pest. Use cages to collect and measure weevil populations, he said.

AgCenter pecan specialist Charlie Graham talked about the new FDA Food Safety Modernization Act and how it might relate to pecan growers.

Because pecans are rarely consumed raw by a majority of Americans, the crop is exempt from the regulations. “This is something we have to monitor over the next several years,” Graham said.

New rice technology featured at field day

By Bruce Schultz
LSU AgCenter

Scientists at the LSU AgCenter H. Rouse Caiffey Rice Research Station talked about their work to help get a new rice technology on the market during a field day on June 29.

More than 500 people attended the event, the 107th annual field day for the station.

Steve Linscombe, station director and rice breeder, said he has been working on the herbicide-resistant Provisia project for less than four years, and it should be available for commercial production by 2018.

Linscombe said Provisia seed from lines that were grown in Puerto Rico are now being grown on 50 acres on the station’s South Farm.

The technology will be a good complement for Clearfield rice to manage red rice and other wild, weedy rice, he said.

Eric Webster, AgCenter weed scientist, said he is working to see how the Provisia herbicide reacts when tank mixed with other herbicides. “Every herbicide you could spray on a rice crop, we have mixed it with Provisia,” he said.

Herbicides such as propanil, RiceBeaux, Grasp and Grasp Xpra, can become ineffective when they are mixed with Provisia.

Jim Oard, AgCenter hybrid rice breeder, said his hybrid rice program includes Provisia line. “So far the material looks quite good,” he said.

Dustin Harrell, AgCenter rice research agronomist and extension specialist, said his research includes determining the optimum amount of fertilizer to use with Provisia. Enough is needed to get the maximum yields, but too much can cause problems such as lodging, he said.

Harrell also talked about his work to increase second-crop or ratoon yields. Cutting stubble after harvest to an 8-inch height can increase yields by five barrels an acre, he said.

He also tested the use of gibberellic acid to increase yields on the first crop.

Ben McKnight, LSU doctoral student in weed science, said his study of benzonobicyclo shows the product works well on aquatic weeds, but it requires water to be effective. “If you lose the flood, you lose your herbicide,” he said.

The new herbicide Loyant is good on barnyardgrass, sprangletop and alligator weed, he said. Availability is expected in 2018.

McKnight also tested the use of gibberellic acid to increase yields on the first crop.

Manoch Kongchum, AgCenter agronomist, discussed his project for testing different flood systems, including no flood, intermittent flood and conventional flood. The project is aimed at improving water use efficiency and gathering data for greenhouse gas research.

Mike Stout, AgCenter entomologist, said 2016 has been one of the worst years for insects in rice. The South American rice miner has infested fields across south Louisiana, but most of the fields have recovered. The insect was first found in Louisiana rice in 2005, but its occurrence since then had been infrequent until this year.

Stout said the Mexican rice borer continues to spread eastward in Louisiana, and it’s likely in all the rice-producing parishes.

Mo Way, Texas A&M entomologist, said an insect called the rice delphacid was a major problem last year in Texas in the second crop. It has the potential to reduce yields by 20 percent.

Don Groth, AgCenter plant pathologist, said an increased rate of propiconazole, at 9 to 12 ounces per acre instead of the previous recommendation of 8 ounces, is needed to protect plants against.

Timing is critical, he said, with the application time between boot split and 50-70 percent heading. Application after heading is too late.

Tom Allen, Mississippi State University plant pathologist, said sheath blight is the biggest disease problem in Mississippi.

In the hybrid project, Oard said the LSU AgCenter agronomist Manoch Kongchum, right, hands rice plants to farmers and consultants at the LSU AgCenter H. Rouse Caiffey Rice Research Station Field Day held June 29 as AgCenter rice research agronomist and extension specialist Dustin Harrell, in background, talks about steps that can be taken to increase ratoon rice crop yields. Photo by Bruce Schultz. RiceTec, said hybrids were first developed in 1966. He said about half of the rice grown in China is from hybrids.

Adam Famoso, AgCenter rice breeder, said new genetic marker technology at the station will enable the screening of thousands of lines of rice for desirable qualities in a fraction of the time and expense that were required just a few years ago.

The same technology has been used in other crops and animals. “We’re in a good position to leverage what they’ve done in other species,” he said.

Jackie Loewer, president of the Louisiana Rice Research Board, said unity among the rice industry is needed. “Only when people work together is anything positive going to happen.”

Loewer presented a check for $1.65 million for research originating from check-off funds provided by rice farmers who pay 5 cents per hundredweight earmarked for research.

Mike Deliberto, AgCenter economist, said long-grain rice prices are projected at $11 per hundredweight and medium-grain rice is projected at $11.30, making both eligible for Price Loss Coverage under the current farm bill.

Deliberto said the 440,000 acres of rice in Louisiana shows a significant decrease of medium-grain acreage by 54 percent and a 36 percent increase in long-grain acreage. Nationwide, rice acreage is 3.1 million acres this year, with the smallest medium-grain crop since 1986.

Jim Quinn, of USA Rice, said the U.S. Food Aid program has the potential to move American-grown rice. Much of the Food Aid rice originates from Louisiana mills, and he said the Wright Co. of Crowley provides the most cost-effective way to fortify rice with nutrients and vitamins required in food aid rice.

Haiti is the largest market for U.S. milled rice, and exports to that country are 31 percent higher this year, he said.

Guinn said negotiations with Iraq are underway for more American rice to be sold there, and the Cuban market holds enormous potential for Louisiana rice. Other countries are able to sell rice to Cuba on credit, but American companies forbidden to do that by the U.S. government prefer.

The pending Trans-Pacific Partnership would eliminate the tariff on Vietnamese rice sold to Mexico, the largest buyer of U.S. rice, he said.

Susan McGouch, a geneticist from Cornell University, said genomic research conducted during the past 25 years is just now having practical applications in plant breeding. The challenge now is to manage the huge amount of information being generated from the genetic work.

“There’s too much information for a single individual to make sense of it,” she said.

Researchers should consider the “Walmart approach” of using massive computer capacity to analyze and collect data, she said. Advances in life sciences in the coming years will be significant. “I think the things that are coming will be exciting for all of you.”

McGouch had high praise for the Rice Research Station. “I really do believe you are one of the premier rice research facilities in the world.”

Ronnie Anderson, Louisiana Farm Bureau executive vice president, said higher education fared better than other state-funded entities in the past legislative sessions. He said the LSU AgCenter has excelled at meeting farmers’ needs, despite past budget cuts.

Roger Leonard, LSU AgCenter associate vice president, credited AgCenter agents for their work to pass along information from research.
