Morehouse Parish farmer wins 2013 Farmer of the Year

LSU AgCenter

Harper Armstrong, of Bastrop, a farmer for the past 47 years in Morehouse Parish, has been selected as the 2013 Louisiana Farmer of the Year.

Former Governor Buddy Roemer was the keynote speaker.

He was among three finalists in a competition sponsored by the Louisiana Agri-News Network, the Louisiana Farm Bureau Federation, the LSU AgCenter and the Louisiana Department of Agriculture and Forestry. The others were Donald Berken, of Welsh, in Jefferson Davis Parish, and Gerald Wood, of St. James, in St. James Parish.

Armstrong farms about 2,500 acres and has grown corn, cotton, soybeans and wheat, but market prices often dictate the crops he chooses.

"Last year was the first year I didn't grow any cotton. It was primarily a cotton operation, but we have switched to a corn, soybeans and wheat operation now," Armstrong said.

Throughout his career, Armstrong has seen technology change the farming landscape. Equipment has gotten bigger, and yields are much better.

"Back in the day, if you made 100-bushel corn, you were raising all kind of sand. Now everyone is striving for 200, and the top yield is pushing 300 bushels. With this new technology and being able to invest in pest control, it has made a big difference," he said.

Armstrong and his wife, Lois, have one daughter, Ashley. All are involved in the farming operation.

While the successes have outnumbered the failures for Armstrong, it only takes one bad year to put a farmer in a difficult situation. Armstrong vividly remembers one such year when drought struck.

"Farming during 1998 was one of the worst years. You plant 800 acres of corn, and you leave 600 or so acres in the field. You got all those bills to pay because you spent the money to fertilize the corn. You're paying your labor, and you can't sell a crop. That hurts, and that will put you out of business," Armstrong said.

Armstrong is the assistant chairman of the National Black Growers Council, president of the Morehouse Black Farmers and Landowners Association, and a board member of the Ag Advisory Board and the Morehouse Activity Center.

Berken farms nearly 1,000 acres and grows primarily rice and soybeans. He always saw himself as a farmer, although his father encouraged him to become a doctor or a lawyer.

"I grew up on a farm. Love working outside, love working on equipment, repairing things, driving tractors. There never was anything else," Berken said.

While Berken knows he must take risks every year, he seeks to minimize this risk by buying used equipment and by broadcast seeding his soybeans as opposed to conventional drill seeding.

"I try to shop for equipment that is used but still has a lot of value See Winner, cont. on page 20

Louisiana Agriculture & Forestry Today

Bayou State will benefit from a beefed-up biofuels sector

Louisiana has been a national leader in energy for generations. Our state's vast natural resources – including crude oil and natural gas – help power a state economy that is outperforming the national average in terms of unemployment rates. However, many do not realize that Louisiana's strong agriculture and forestry industries have also primed us to be a national leader in new forms of energy: like advanced biofuels.

The Louisiana State University recently announced it has received a five-year, $17.2 million grant from the United States Department of Agriculture, paving the way for the LSU AgCenter Audubon Sugar Institute to open a pilot plant in St.

Gabriel. The new facility is designed to produce biofuels and biochemicals from agricultural crops and byproducts like sweet sorghum, energy cane and other grassy feedstocks.

Our state has the incredible potential to produce 813.5 million gallons of advanced biofuels each year. This opportunity is a win-win – it benefits our rural communities by providing economic opportunity while diversifying Louisiana's economy so that it can continue to grow and adapt in the coming decades.

To ensure that Louisiana remains a national energy leader as our country's energy mix evolves, our elected officials need to support the development of a comprehensive national energy strategy that continues to promote the use of advanced biofuels. In addition to providing economic opportunity for our state, this policy helps enhance our energy security, environmental sustainability, and fuel diversity.

Even established companies like Valero Energy Corporation and Darling International Inc. recognize the value and importance of a new energy future. That is why they have invested millions in a 137-million gallon per year renewable diesel facility in Norco, Louisiana, about 20 miles west of New Orleans. This project is estimated to create 700 jobs during peak construction and over 60 jobs during operation. Similarly, companies like Sundrop Fuels and Emerald Biofuels are investing in biofuels and creating jobs in Alexandria and Plaquemine, respectively.

The production of renewable fuels nationally already supports jobs for, and has employed, more than 400,000 Americans, while reducing the need for foreign oil by more than 462 million barrels. Rolling back our national commitment to a more diversified liquid transportation fuels sector would not only send the wrong message to the biofuels industry and hinder job creation across the country, but also block Louisiana from attracting additional jobs in the energy sector – a sector in which this state has always been – and should always be a leader in. As we look forward, it is encouraging to see that biomass from Louisiana agriculture will play a role in supplying the feedstocks for manufacturing advanced biofuels and biochemicals as we move the USA toward the goal of energy independence.

in it. I can use that money to put a crop in and not make as much a crop loan. You can plant soybeans today and get a 3-inch rain tomorrow. You're going to lose that stand. But if you broadcast and increase your seeding rates 10-15 percent, you ensure yourself a stand, and it's a little less risky," Berken said.

Wood farms more than 6,000 acres of sugarcane in St. James and Pointe Coupee parishes. He grew up on a farm, but it was mainly a cattle operation. He knew he would be a farmer early in life, but his father insisted that Wood go to college.

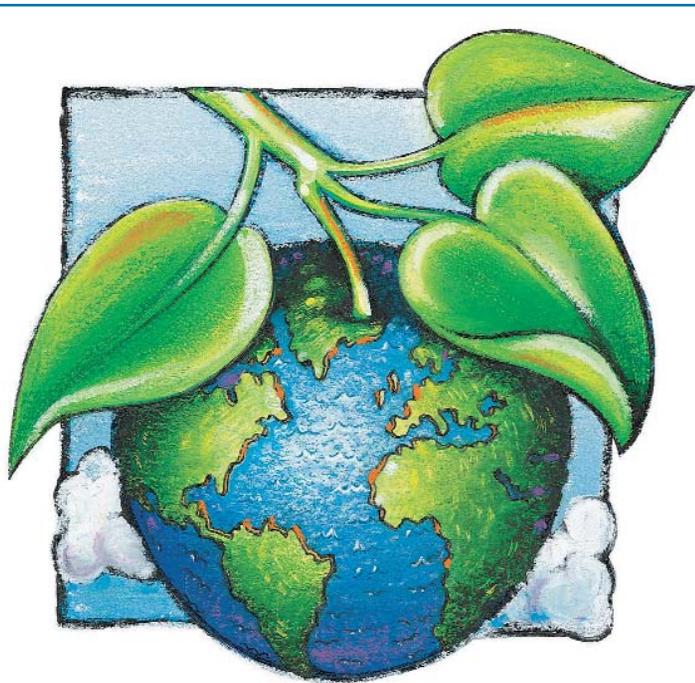

"When I got out of high school, I was ready to farm. My father said, 'You got to go to college or you can't work on the farm.' So I went to LSU in animal science, and the rest is history," Wood said.

For Wood, the most stressful times are the planting season in summer followed by cultivation and fertilization in spring. But all of the hard work and stress are justified come harvest time.

"The most rewarding time is harvest. And it's the least stressful time for me because in the morning, I don't care whether it rains or snows, I don't care if the mail passes or not. I have to get that crop of sugarcane every day to the mill until we are finished," he said.

For being selected Farmer of the Year, Armstrong received $1,000 and 100 hours' use of a Case IH Magnum tractor. For being named finalists, Berken and Wood each received $500.

New soybean app helps farmers identify weed, insect and disease problems

-LSU AgCenter Report-

The LSU AgCenter has developed a mobile Web application, also known as an app, that will allow soybean farmers to easily identify weed, insect and disease problems in their fields by just grabbing their smartphones.

Known as the Soybean Field Guide, the app can be easily accessed on a smartphone, such as an iPhone or an Android, or on an electronic tablet, such as an iPad. The app can also be viewed on a laptop or desktop computer.

"This is a one-stop shop," said Jim Griffin, AgCenter weed scientist and the principal author of the weed information. "This app will help farmers identify the weed, insect or disease that's causing problems."

Once the problem is identified, then the app includes links to the AgCenter's three control guides – the Soybean Weed Control Guide, Control Soybean Insect Pests and Soybean Plant Disease Management Guide.

The app contains nearly 200 photos of weeds, insects and disease symptoms – some that can be viewed at different stages and at several angles.

The app also includes information about when and how to scout for these problems.

"If a farmer is out in his field, he can easily compare what he's seeing to the photos," Griffin said.

a Web browser at <http://soybean.lsuagcenter.com>. If viewing on a smart phone or mobile device, the app will automatically provide a way to add a shortcut icon to the device screen or a bookmark for ease of viewing at any time.

If people have any problems with the app, they can send an email to mobileapps@agcenter.lsu.edu, said Fred Piazza, the AgCenter's chief information officer.

"We've thoroughly tested this app," Piazza said. "But we are anxious for feedback because we will continue producing educational apps. This is the way people want information now."

"The beauty of this app is that it will be continually updated, and these updates will happen automatically. The user will not have to do anything for the updates," said Frankie Gould, the AgCenter's communication director.
